Why teaching?

I am passionate about the importance of early childhood education. By working in partnership with families to best meet the needs of individual children, I strive to promote a love of learning and positively influence a child's future. I believe I have been given the privilege of providing the foundations for developing social and academic skills and that families who leave their children in my care deserve the best possible outcomes.

My enthusiasm for teaching is maintained because of the wonderful support I receive from my husband, preschool families, Jervis Bay School colleagues and the community.

Fostering a sense of community and belonging

Uniquely located on the HMAS Creswell Naval Base in Jervis Bay Territory, Jervis Bay Preschool caters for students from diverse cultural backgrounds. More than 70 per cent of students are from Indigenous backgrounds and 20 per cent are from naval or federal police families. The remainder of students come from nearby towns in New South Wales, or are from families of Booderee National Park personnel. As preschool coordinator and head teacher, Vicki Fortescue works hard to ensure a harmonious learning environment for this diverse range of children.

Vicki works collaboratively with the children and parents to structure individual learning plans for each preschooler. She has devised a set of key indicators that she uses to monitor each child's development throughout the preschool year. The indicators cover such areas as social and motor skills, literacy, and information and communication technologies.

Vicki has been instrumental in developing and maintaining the Booderee Junior Ranger Program which is run in partnership with the nearby Booderee National Park. Indigenous park rangers visit the school to teach the preschoolers about environmental and cultural awareness. The children also visit the national park to learn about local flora, fauna, and cultural history.

Jervis Bay Preschool has become a pilot school for the Department of Education's Early Entry Indigenous Program that aims to improve the educational opportunities for young Indigenous learners. Vicki's ability to integrate and motivate her diverse school population has been recognised, and she has been asked to be a presenter at the Dare To Lead National Early Childhood Conference.

Vicki is a teacher who cares greatly about the successful transition of her preschoolers to further education. She supports and inspires her students so as to give each child the chance of enjoying a successful learning journey.
